Brief Description

This course will focus primarily on Postmodern literary texts (and some films) and will consider these texts as representatives of a distinct literary/filmic style, and all that this entails in the context of the development of fictional forms and the history of the novel. After establishing some major precursors and shaping influences, we will consider the primary philosophical and narrative characteristics of postmodern literature. Finally, we consider several suggestions regarding the evolution of postmodern literary forms in recent years, or we will consider the way in which “classical” postmodern fictions have influenced the contemporary novel. Students will be able to demonstrate knowledge and understanding of a substantial number of authors and texts from the period, as well as to discern key differences between different strands of postmodern writing and aesthetics as well as the difference between aesthetic and ideological readings. This course is informed by a broad range of disciplines and students will engage with concepts and texts from history, philosophy, literature, aesthetic philosophy, art history, science, film studies, and ethics.

Method of Instruction

3 Hour Seminar

Approach: Contextual presentation by the instructor forms the central focus of the seminar, in which students are encouraged to participate, ask questions, discuss amongst themselves. The presentation involves some theoretical comments about the author of the text we are working on, the period, and the major theoretical concepts that have significance for the author/text. Students are encouraged to participate freely in this period of the class. Presentation is supplemented by multi-media resources (audio/visual interviews, supporting material, music, paintings, commentaries, and/or historically-relevant information).
