The 1960's counterculture refers to an anti-establishment cultural phenomenon that developed first in Great Britain and the USA, and then spread throughout much of the Western world to the mid-1970s – with London, New York City and San Francisco being hotbeds of early countercultural activity – and also to other locales such as Japan. There is a link between more developed societies and the ability to challenge its very successes. The aggregate movement gained momentum as the Civil Rights Movement grew in the US, and would later become revolutionary with the expansion of the military intervention in Vietnam. As the 1960s progressed, social tensions also developed concerning other issues, and tended to flow along generational lines – among youth and young adults – regarding sexuality, women's rights, traditional modes of authority and the experimentation with psychoactive drugs. This module aims to introduce students to the impact of the socio-cultural changes of the 1960s on cinematic production in the USA, Britain and Japan. The 'ethics' in this module relates to the moral and other principles that govern a person's behaviour or the conducting of an activity, and how older social norms become challenged in the process. The counterculture was not only affected by cinema, but was also instrumental in the provision of era-relevant content and talent for the film industry. The film that developed also had an experimental edge to it. Although never a formally organised movement, the so-called New Wave filmmakers were linked by their self-conscious rejection of classical cinematic form and their spirit of youthful iconoclasm. Many also engaged in their work with the social and political upheavals of the era, making their radical experiments with editing, visual style and narrative – and in that respect this module deals with such developments, and particularly with Japanese avant-garde film. Students will be expected to engage with both the content of the films and the forms that the films take.
