Choose from 10 Double-story villas, each with its own swimming pool.

D’Resort At Downtown East

The spa has a pool with a slide and a lazy river, as well as a kids’ pool.

Citadines Connect City Centre

Citadines Connect City Centre’s Family Suite has a bunk bed with a pull-out, so up to three kids can sleep here.

Hilton Singapore Orchard

Hilton Singapore Orchard has a pool with a slide and a lazy river, as well as a kids’ pool.

Intercontinental Singapore

Intercontinental Singapore has a pool with a slide and a lazy river, as well as a kids’ pool.

Shangri-La Rasa Sentosa

Shangri-La Rasa Sentosa has a pool with a slide and a lazy river, as well as a kids’ pool.

Minor Issues

Is it okay that my daughter has no enrichment classes?

With many kids doing so, I wonder if I am short-changing my child who refuses to attend extra lessons.

Parent Flow

When parents have to work, they can struggle to find the time to attend enrichment classes for their kids. What should parents do if their child is not interested in enrichments?

Most Singapore parents believe they should provide their kids with the best education possible. However, the question of whether extra classes are necessary or beneficial is often debated. Parents may feel pressured to enroll their children in various enrichment classes to give them a competitive edge in school. However, some parents may struggle to balance work and family responsibilities, making it difficult to find the time and resources to support their child's enrichment.

The debate around extra classes often centers on the potential benefits and drawbacks. While some parents may see extra classes as a way to give their children a head start, others may argue that too much pressure can lead to burnout.

In this era of educational competition, parents are often faced with the challenge of deciding what is best for their child. It is essential to consider not only the academic benefits but also the emotional and social aspects of the child's development. Balancing the needs of the child with the ambitions of the parents is crucial in making informed decisions.

For some parents, the idea of additional classes can be daunting. However, for others, finding the right balance between academic focus and personal interests can lead to a more fulfilling and enjoyable learning experience. Ultimately, the decision to enroll in extra classes should be based on what is best for the child, not just the parents’ aspirations.

The key is to listen to your child and understand their interests. It is important to create a supportive environment where your child feels safe to express their thoughts and preferences. Encouraging open communication can help parents and children come to an agreement on what is best for their situation.

In conclusion, the decision to enroll in extra classes is a personal one, and it is crucial to consider the child’s perspective. The goal should be to provide a balanced and fulfilling educational experience that respects the child's interests and needs. Ultimately, the key is to find a compromise that allows for enrichment without overwhelming the child with additional pressure.